Sir Robert Borwick's title is not hereditary, being a knighthood. But he is well-off indeed, and has a town house in Berkeley square, London, adjoining that of Lord Rosebery, and a beautiful country house without having it previously inspected by a sanitary expert. The expert arrived in due course at Rushton Hall, and it did not take him long to discover that the drainage system was all wrong, and that it would have to be entirely pulled to pieces and reconstructed. So the King's visit is delayed for at least another year, and James J. Van Alen's gloom is become something altogether impenetrable by reason of his cruel disappointment.
